the cowboy of the Texas Panhandle made his famous ride for life. He was bitten by a skunkýwhile sleeping by his camp fire, and realized all his danger. Some of his companions remembered to have heard that five hundred miles away, in a town of eastern Kansas. there lived the owner of a famous "madstone," reputed to possess the power of drawing the poison from wounds made by snakes or rabid animals. Night and day the cowboy rode at full speed for this town and safety. At every ranch where he halted he found a willing exchange of a fresh horse for his tired animal, and his journey was tireless. It was a race for life, and he won. He reached his destination on the third day, the "madstone" was applied to the wound, and after adhering for days, at last fell off and would stick no longer, and the owner of the stone pronounced him cured. Whether through this treatment or from natural causes, the wound healed with no further trouble, was talking. "Like the prairie dog and badger the skunk of the plains makes its hole in the open prairie. In size and markings and characteristic means of defense and offense it closely resembles its relatives in the east. Like them it is carnivorous, and prowls about at a person comes upon it away from its gies in trying to run away, but impolitely turns its face from the intruder and stands its ground with confidence proach too near. It is its fearlessness of man that makes this wretched little beast such a terror, for it will boldly enter a tent or come anywhere that persons are asleep on the ground, and if, it finds nothing about that better suits its taste, will begin without hesitation to eat at the hand, face, or any other part of exposed. This would be bad enough of itself, for the creature's weasel teeth $4,0000 are as sharp as knives, and a man may 1.08.25 find himself badly lacerated when he fully wakes to what is going on. the mastering horror of the skunk's it to rects bite comes from the fact that it almost invariably results in hydrophobia to the victim.
